

In the time since Indiana implemented its telephone privacy law, I am very pleased at how greatly the volume of unsolicited calls has been reduced. I can think of no more than two since spring, compared to easily 2-3 per week prior. One of them, when challenged, claimed to have a personal investment in the product (or service), but cut the call when pressed for details.

I am very satisfied with the terms of Indiana's legislation, and am thus concerned at the (alleged) push to standardize on a less-restrictive level. We cannot afford caller ID, and we find it awkward to ignore inbound calls on the hope that a "desired" caller will catch us at a different time.

For my family, I respectfully ask that you do not weaken my home life.
